

Master of Education

with a specialism in inclusive and special education

The Master of Education program has been designed to give our students more flexibility and better options in their studies. As education moves towards and embraces areas of specific need and opportunity, Monash University gives students dedicated specialisations in which to explore and test their learning.

The Master in Education with a specialism in inclusive and special education is designed to meet the needs of primary, secondary, adult educators, principals and health professionals interested in developing professional skills for supporting people with a diverse range of special needs. It is also suitable for educators who wish to meet the requirements for employment in special schools. If you wish to teach special education in Australian schools, you must have a separate recognised teaching qualification.

The Master of Education is flexible, so you can tailor a program to suit your specific needs. All students complete a core research methodology unit chosen from a suite which gives you an introduction to key social and educational research methods. You will also choose a number of elective units, and have the option of completing a professional project or a minor research thesis in an area that interests you.

There are three key options in the Master of Education degree, depending on what you aim to achieve in your degree.

Option 1 is to take six coursework units.

Option 2 is five coursework units and a professional project of approximately 8000 words.

Option 3 is four coursework units and a minor research thesis of approximately 16,000 words.

Option 3 provides a great introduction to formal research in education, and can act as a pathway into the Doctor of Philosophy (PhD) program, provided you meet the grade point entry requirements for that program.

You can choose coursework units from a wide range of elective units, covering topics including education, leadership, literacy studies, early childhood, and curriculum design.
