

Master of Education

with a specialism in work and learning studies

The Master of Education program has been designed to give our students more flexibility and better options in their studies. As education moves towards and embraces areas of specific need and opportunity, Monash University gives students dedicated specialisations in which to explore and test their learning.

The Master in Education with a specialism in work and learning studies is designed for teachers, lecturers, trainers, enterprise-based teachers, community educators, educational administrators, policy makers, education managers and others interested or involved in adult learning, vocational and further education and training, and educators who wish to understand and investigate education policy and practice in a variety of learning contexts.

The Master of Education is flexible, so you can tailor a program to suit your specific needs. All students complete a core research methodology unit chosen from a suite which gives you an introduction to key social and educational research methods.

You will also choose a number of elective units, and have the option of completing a professional project or a minor research thesis in an area that interests you.

There are three key options in the Master of Education degree, depending on what you aim to achieve in your degree.

Option 1 is to take six coursework units.

Option 2 is five coursework units and a professional project of approximately 8000 words.

Option 3 is four coursework units and a minor research thesis of approximately 16,000 words.

Option 3 provides a great introduction to formal research in education, and can act as a pathway into the Doctor of Philosophy (PhD) program, provided you meet the grade point entry requirements for that program.

You can choose coursework units from a wide range of elective units, covering topics in education, leadership, mentoring, and inclusive and special education and curriculum design. ### What our students say

Dong Hun Jeung

Current Student, Master of Education with a specialism in work and learning studies

"The balanced understanding between theories and practice are a strong point of this course. The questions that units pose to students, such as "how should this theory be applied to our workplace?" are so helpful and effective. I have a lot of chances to meet other international students, as well as local students who have a variety of backgrounds and I thank the lecturers for their insight and generous support."

Renee Yanfang Cui

Current student, Master of Education with a specialism in work and learning studies

"For me, the course gives me a chance to look into the theories in this area, which I will surely translate into practice in the future. Actually, it has answered some questions I had when I was working as a training specialist in my previous workplaces."
